Governor Manning of South Carolina has recommended a law raising the age limit of children working in factories, mines and textile establishments. He said that a large number of school districts have placed themselves under the compulsory school attendance law, but this was not true in mill districts because the minimum age limit of the child labor law is 12 years. The school law maximum is 14 years. The child labor law, declared the chief executive, prevents school districts in mill sections from taking advantage of the school legislation. A workmen's compensation law is included in the recommendations.

With the growing numbers of wounded from the front as Britain's army expands and the spheres of operations increase, England is faced with a dearth of doctors, and the strain on the medical men left to look after the civilian population is becoming heavier every day. A mobilization of doctors is being considered.
